

AIR ASTANA GETS FULL SAFETY CLEARANCE IN LATEST EU AIR SAFETY LIST

News / Airlines

Air Astana, the SkyTrax award-winning flag carrier of Kazakhstan, is very pleased to report that it has officially been removed from a list of airlines that have faced operating restrictions in the EU. In July 2009 all carriers of Kazakhstan were banned from operating to Europe while Air Astana was the only exception. The EU's Air Safety Committee had recognised that Air Astana's safety standards were fully compliant with the international standards and establish a system for safe flights, but had imposed a cap on the airline's existing number of services to the EU at the time. Those restrictions were lifted in February 2014, enabling the airline to expand its European route network. Earlier this year Paris was added to its European route network, joining London Heathrow, Frankfurt and Amsterdam.

The EU Safety List*, published last week, coincides with the EC's adoption of its new Aviation Strategy for Europe. The list is essential to guarantee the highest level of air safety for European citizens, which is an absolute priority of the Commission. It complements the new authorisation scheme for third country operators, which is being phased-in since June 2015. It will further boost air safety while cutting red-tape, the Commission stated.

EU Commissioner for Transport Violeta Bulc said, "Offering the highest level of air safety to European citizens is a priority of the Commission. I am satisfied that we were able to clear Air Astana after six years of work. In the interest of European citizens, we are however forced to maintain other Kazakh carriers on the list.
