Business aviation to see new gains in productivity, safety and effectiveness with leadership training offered to wider target audience

GLOBALJET Services, Inc., a leader in on-location aviation aircraft, avionics, safety, and professional development training, has completed a strategic direction to offer their Aviation Interpersonal Management (AIM) course to a broader target audience. The highly interactive 5-day class is the acknowledged industry standard for building leaders in aviation today.

Many aviation professionals are seldom taught the techniques needed to succeed in team-building, effective resource utilization, conflict resolution, and other “soft skills” required for achieving necessary management goals. GLOBALJET provides key professional development skills to put advancement within the grasp of a greater segment of the community contributing to the overall success of business aviation.

While formerly offered primarily to aviation maintenance technicians, this change in professional development curriculum from GLOBALJET Services will now enhance leadership and communication skills within the entire flight operations team, including pilots, schedulers and dispatchers, customer service representatives, line service, and support personnel.

Strengthening their commitment to worldwide success for aviation professionals, this move underscores a fundamental aspect of GLOBALJET's mission statement: to raise industry standards and respect for all aviation personnel across the industry.

This new audience selection should bring about further improvements to aviation in the areas of productivity, cost-reductions, effective communication and total safety —and on a wider scale.
